

Acknowledgements

As always when a book is finished, there are many people to thank for their contributions both direct and indirect, and especially for their moral support. I am therefore immensely grateful to many friends and colleagues who have helped me to keep my perspective through the onerous process of creating a book that straddles—as this one does—two quite different academic specialties, and through the upheaval of office renovations, curricular development, and computer disasters.

I begin by thanking Burton Urquhart of the Graham Centre at the University of Saskatchewan for his indispensable help with this and a second manuscript I was preparing at the same time. His good humour, his reliable record-keeping, and his research assistance—not to mention his cat-sitting—have all been an immense help to me over the past several months. I would like also to acknowledge Jeanie Wills, Deb Rolfes, and Rebekah Bennetch, also of the Graham Centre, who, along with Burton, thoughtfully read the first draft of the manuscript and gave me their helpful comments. All four of these remarkable people are colleagues in the fullest sense of the word, and I am thrilled that they have chosen to direct their considerable talents to the success of the Graham Centre.

I owe a debt of gratitude also to the former Dean of Engineering, Claude Lague, who has been a consistent support to me in so many ways, and especially in our quest to establish the Centre for the Study of Communication; I know that it would not have come about without his commitment. I would also like to acknowledge Lynn Danbrook, College of Engineering Development Officer, whose hard work brought the dream closer to reality. I am grateful, too, to D.K. Seaman, who has always fully supported my efforts to develop innovative programming for engineering students and professionals, and who gave us his blessing as we sought to extend the responsibilities and the scope of the Chair he established. It goes without saying, of course, that I am deeply indebted to Ron and Jane Graham for their faith in the approach I wished to take in the new Centre for the Study of Communication, and I promise to do everything in my power to make them proud of what their most generous gift has allowed us to do.

My friends and mentors David Male, Emeritus Professor of Mechanical Engineering, John Thompson, President Emeritus of St Thomas More College, and Richard Burton, Professor of Mechanical Engineering, have also provided me with inspiration and support, for which I am enormously grateful. This has been a grueling year in many ways, but it has been brightened immeasurably by their thoughtfulness and constancy. I am humbled by their continued commitment to what I am doing here, and I can't help but wonder at my remarkable good fortune at being blessed with their friendship.

I have been glad of the patient understanding I've received from the editorial staff at Oxford University Press, in particular Roberta Osborne, Dina Theleritis, and Eric Sinkins, all of whom have been models of collegiality and professionalism, who have respected my efforts and understood the enormous and competing demands on my time over the past year. My e-mail conversations with Cliff Newman continue to be a source of genuine pleasure, and I look forward to his never really retiring. My professional association with David Stover is now 20 years old (happy anniversary, David!), which I am sure surprises him as much as it does me. I hope it delights him in equal measure, as it does me.

Without the support of David Cowan, my most treasured friend, my closest confidant, and the funniest, kindest, wittiest, and most patient and unflappable man in the world, the demands of this past year would have been impossible to meet. I would be utterly lost without him.

Finally, I am deeply grateful to the remarkable Malcolm Reeves, Assistant Dean in the College of Engineering, for his incredible patience and steadfastness, his hard work and dedication, and especially his gift for strategy. In his every action he is a model of outstanding communication, both interpersonally and rhetorically. It is just one small indication of how dearly we in the Graham Centre love him that I dedicate this book to him.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.