CONSTITUTIONAL LAW is a one semester course taught at the Pearl River High School as an elective for eleventh and twelfth grade students. The goal of this course is the intelligent and responsible sharing of power in order to attain justice.

Governments are instituted among men in order to guarantee inalienable natural rights, but men have to surrender some alienable freedom in order to have a society. Social order requires law, and laws must be made, interpreted and enforced, so the legislative, judicial, and executive functions are defined. The concept of justice implies a government of law, not of man, and its ideal is an equal justice for all. Pure democracy, as practiced in the Greek city-states, and in New England town meeting, permitted the citizen to take part directly in government, but the increasing size of political units and their populations has developed the machinery of representation and of federalism. In the latter, the balancing of local and central control has been a varying equation depending upon the time. The ability of the central government to extend its powers to the borders of its realm has varied over the centuries and has been many machineries of empire, none so effective as that established by the Northwest Ordinance of 1787.

The government of any society at any period has represented some balance of freedom and security for its people, ranging from the Jeffersonian ideal of little government and much freedom to the dictatorships with some security and no freedom. Men, not law, have ruled sometimes; privilege, not equal justice for all, has at times been rampant. Economic specialization and competition have produced tactics on legislation. In the making of laws today, 50 grist mills grind out laws which often conflict and overlap bewilderingly, to the confusion of the citizen. Every generation relearns anew the hard tasks of democracy.

At no other time in our history has government and its problems evoked more widespread and sustained interest than today. Although comprehension of government requires a knowledge of highly technical terms and an understanding of structure, the course will not follow a format of structure, but rather become a practical instrument reflecting the needs and aspirations of our students. The course recognizes government as the science of human relationships and within this framework it will stress the individual and his relation to society, and with groups which have common as well as conflicting interests.

The course will provide adequate historical material to serve as the necessary background to grasp theories and principles in the cognitive domain. An emphasis will be placed on correlating governmental principles and functions with contemporary events. The constitution will take on the image of a living document which then shapes the pattern of national government.

The course is designed to examine the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States in order to witness the legislation-by-interpretation doctrine as it correlates governmental principles and functions. The course provides adequate historical material to serve as the necessary background to grasp theories - in short, the impact the Supreme Court has had on our lives.
