ABSTRACT

This 63-page annotated bibliography contains available materials in the area of political communication, a relatively new field of political science. Political communication includes facets of the election process and interaction between political parties and the voter. A variety of materials dating from 1960 to 1972 include books, pamphlets, journal and magazine articles, unpublished papers and dissertations, Congressional Quarterly articles, and government publications. The following seven areas of the field are examined: (1) general campaign techniques; (2) media and advertising techniques; (3) polling, surveying, and the use of computers for data collection; (4) theories and techniques of political attitude change and persuasion; (5) specific elections; (6) the techniques of political parties; and (7) financing of campaigns. The collection is partially annotated. (JR)

Introduction

Bibliographical compilation can be dry and dull. When, however, a field such as political communication is comparatively new, the process can be truly exciting, and can give the compiler an overall sense of currently available research materials as well.

With so many politicians, scholars, and writers claiming to have mastered many of the techniques of political campaigning, it was appealing to me to collect this information in a manner that could be useful to the practical politician as well as to the scientific researcher.

The process of compiling any bibliography can best be characterized by the finished product. The following pages show the divisions and directions that I found most useful. The collection is only partially annotated and covers the specific period of 1960 to 1972. It makes no pretense of completeness even for that period.

Upon conclusion of this project I felt even more strongly than at the outset that political communication has exciting prospects if we are willing to consider it in a freely interdisciplinary context. As a veteran of the political arena, as well as of academic departments of political science and communication, I see an exciting future and compelling need for descriptive and empirical research in this area.
