ABSTRACT

This booklet presents a book list, activities, and teacher resources to provide teachers a starting place for works of adolescent literature that will initiate conversations and questions about gender roles and the perceptions of appropriate behavior and activities. It is designed to bring teachers' attention to more recent titles in order to augment the curriculum and assist teachers in addressing the concerns of today's young adult readers. It lists 39 short stories and collections, 45 works of contemporary realistic fiction, 9 works of fantasy/science fiction, 19 works of historical fiction, 5 works of folklore, 17 works of biography or autobiography, 6 works of personal narrative, 17 informational books, 13 works about drama, and 9 works of poetry. It lists 12 teacher resources and 12 activities for building a more balanced English language arts curriculum in the English classroom. (RS)

Gender equity does not exist in business, in academics, or athletics. One other place equity does not exist is within the scope of our English language arts curriculum. In part, the inequity in the curriculum is one of invisibility—fewer female than male protagonists are represented in books written for adolescents, particularly in the works of the traditional canon. Additionally, few of those young female protagonists are strong enough of mind, body, or will to serve as positive role models for the young women in our classrooms.

Another facet of the inequity in literature is that many characters are not shown as multidimensional humans with strengths as well as weaknesses. Instead, both males and females display behavior and traits that reflect stereotyped roles, responsibilities, and expectations. Although there may be segments of our society that are redefining gender roles, the female and male characters adolescents read about are often locked into traditional roles and behaviors.

As teachers and adults who work with adolescents, we advocate wide reading of good literature as one way for students to have vicarious experiences in which they can identify with strong characters across a wide range of human experiences which cross traditional gender boundaries. But if texts and the characters in them remain gender-bound, the ideas which might cause adolescents to develop expectations for the future, responses to life's events, and stances on issues may also remain stereotypically gender-bound.

We must all search for texts that will initiate conversations and questions about gender roles and the perceptions of appropriate behavior and activities. Through these conversations and questions, teachers can be instrumental in helping students reflect on gendered expectations. Teachers can challenge those expectations by showing options and alternatives so readers seek to confront the inequities they find in their own lives.

There are many contemporary classics which are already in place in our curriculum, such as I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings and The Diary of Anne Frank. The purpose of this guide is to bring to your attention more recent titles in order to augment your curriculum and to assist you in addressing the concerns of today's young adult readers.

The following booklist, the activities, and the teacher resources provide a starting place. We invite each of you to continue to find other resources and to share them with your students and your peers.

ideas for building a more balanced English language arts curriculum in your English classroom

1. Weave books about, for, and by women/girls into every aspect of the curriculum, especially materials that show females as active participants in life and able to succeed in any endeavor, rather than passive observers and recipients of the actions and decisions of others.
2. Take a global view of language by valuing the stories and writing of people from all cultural groups and walks of life.
3. Privilege the more feminine styles/forms of writing by asking students to read and write in many formats, including diaries, journals, and dramas.
4. Compare the ways in which males and females are portrayed in various genres and works of literature.
5. Build an understanding of gender roles as affected by cultural mores by pairing Suzanne Fisher Staple's Haveli and Lensey Namioka's April and the Dragon Lady.
6. Examine the role of gender in media and analyze the ways in which girls/women/boys/men may be defined stereotypically.
7. Include nonprint media which presents girls/women/boys/men in positive and non-stereotypic roles.
8. Pair books with similar themes or topics to include both a male and female protagonist. For example when reading an identity novel with a male character such as Robert Cormier's Chocolate War, also read Sharon Creech's book Walk Two Moons, which features the struggles of a girl character.
9. Pair a work from the traditional canon such as The Diary of Anne Frank with a more recent work that explores similar lives, struggles, or era such as Jane Yolen's Briar Rose. (See Kaywell's Complement to the Classics or Herz and Gallo's From Hinton to Hamlet.)

10. Use children's literature to help students explore complex issues and themes through illustrations and simplified story lines; for example, Anthony Browne's Piggybook or Faith Ringgold's Tar Beach.
11. Implement classroom strategies such as literature circles and response groups to ensure personal engagement with the text's concerns and encourage the voicing of variant opinions.
12. Institute a reading workshop to approach literature by providing for individual choice as well as differences in preference and reading level.
